Introduction

The Division of Mental Health and Addiction (DMHA) looks at how well its providers are doing in many ways. One method used by the Division is a telephone survey. Consumers are asked about their satisfaction with the services they have received. The results of these are published in the Consumer Survey Report Cards.

The Division also looks at data the providers send to examine the amount and kinds of services that they deliver. This information forms the basis for the Provider Survey Report Cards and is also used by DMHA to make funding decisions.

A third way of assessing how providers are doing is to look at the outcomes of the services they are providing. In other words, what difference are the services making in the lives of consumers? The Division is now able to look at the outcomes of services in a more direct manner. Providers assess individuals twice each year. These clinical assessments are sent to the Division on a quarterly basis. The providers send the Division information on the consumer including diagnosis, age, race, where they live, and what kinds of services they receive. The Division measures outcomes of services by comparing changes in assessment information over time.

This report on outcomes looks at changes in the assessments of people who were seen in three different years, or as many years as the provider offered services under contract with the Division. Did people who were seen in 1999 and again in 2000 get better or worse? How about 2000 and 2001? In order to answer these questions, issues of risk adjustment, provider comparisons and performance indicators must be addressed.

Risk Adjustment

The process of grouping individuals receiving services in order to compare outcomes of services is referred to as risk adjustment. For example, it is desirable not to compare outcomes for people with severe heroin addiction with the outcomes for people who have a mild addiction to other drugs. The people with a crack, cocaine, or heroin addiction are more likely to need counseling for their addiction than those addicted to certain other drugs. They are at greater “risk” than the group using other drugs. The graphs on the Provider Summary pages therefore group consumers in the most homogeneous associations possible, to ensure the comparability of the data. Those groups, comprising all severities of addiction, are: Crack, Cocaine, and Heroin Users; Users of Other Drugs over Age 35; and Users of Other Drugs under Age 35. Risk adjustment could also take into consideration the severity of the addiction, but we did not have sufficient numbers of survey responses to take the analysis to that deeper level.

Provider Comparisons

In addition, we need to see how successful a provider is at treating individuals within each of the three groups. Comparing a provider’s success with the average rate of success for all providers does this. Do more individuals in a group at a particular agency show improvement from one year to the next than individuals in the same risk group at other agencies? In order to make such a comparison we had to develop a fair and understandable system for turning individual scores into agency performance indicators. This was accomplished through the development of performance indicators.

Performance Indicators

For each of the three groups, the Division looked at people who received services in State Fiscal Year 1999 (July 1, 1998 through June 30, 1999), State Fiscal Year 2000 (July 1, 1999 through June 30, 2000) and State Fiscal Year 2001 (July 1, 2000 through June 30, 2001). We looked at the difference in people’s assessment scores. For each group, there was a wide range of scores. Each group was then split into thirds, with one group being “most improved”, one group being “least improved” and one group being in the middle or “average.” If the providers were all doing the same quality of care, for each of the three groups they would have one third of their consumers fall into the most improved group, one third in the least improved group, and one third in the middle. However, there were some differences between providers. We would expect that, in general, providers that did better than other providers in one year would do better again in the other.

One more issue: For some of the groups, the number of people seen was very small. If any agency saw only a few people in one of the categories, it would not be fair to compare the percentages. If an organization had less than three individuals that were seen in two consecutive years in any of the three categories, we dropped that category for that agency for that two-year comparison period. In addition to omitting bars for categories containing less than three observations, no provider page was included if the related data contained no observations or if each of the three categories contained an insufficient number of observations. However, data obtained for all providers is included in the tables on pages 42-44.

How to Read the Graphs

Each provider’s information is represented on a graph. In each table, the 1998-1999 data is shown first, followed by the 1999-2000 and the 2000-2001 data. This is done for each diagnostic category. The number of people who were assessed in each year and fall into each group is shown.

As mentioned earlier, if providers were all having the same level of success with a particular diagnostic group, one third of the people they saw would be in the “most improved” category, one third in the “least improved” category and the remaining third would be in the “average” improvement group. To delineate these expected levels of performance there are marks that represent 33% and 67% along the sides of the graphs.

For each diagnostic category, if the provider has more than one third of its consumers in the “most improved” group, the provider is doing better than average. On the graphs, the “most improved” category is represented by the darkest shading and appears at the bottom of the graph bars. In the sample graph (see following page), the column second from the far-left shows that the sample provider had 24 people with Crack, Cocaine or Heroin addictions that were seen in SFY 2000 (July 1, 1999 through June 30, 2000). Of those 24 individuals, 12 were in the most improved category, 4 were in the average category and 8 were in the least improved category. For consumers in SFY 2000, the graph shows that more than one third of their consumers in this category were the most improved. Since more than one third were in this “most improved” category, this provider did better than average.

In that same category, exactly two-thirds (16) of the consumers with Crack, Cocaine or Heroin addictions seen in SFY 2000 were in either the “most improved” or “average improvement” category. This is an indication that the provider was average with consumers in this diagnostic category.

Considering the graphs visually, the larger or taller the darkest shading in a column, and the smaller the lighter shading, the more successful the provider was in helping consumers improve from one year to the next. In the third column or bar from the left, the graph shows that approximately 32% (14 of 44) of the consumers with Crack, Cocaine or Heroin addictions seen in SFY 2001 were among the least improved. Since this is slightly less than the expected one-third, this provider did better than average with this group among those seen in SFY 2001.

Some providers were not contracted to provide services for the Division in all three two-year periods shown on the Provider Summary graphs. Others did not report on a sufficient number of clients to permit a statistically valid analysis of their outcomes. In these cases, a zero is shown on the graph instead of a stacked bar.
